Introduction

The war of 1812 was the first international conflict since the American Revolution which involved British North America. It was also the first conflict in which the inhabitants of Canada took a very active part in its defense and, by their activity, helped to seal the direction of its political evolution.

In 1775 when the rebellious British colonies to the south had invaded Canada, the population of the country was largely French-speaking Roman Catholic. Canada had been preserved as a British bastion in North America during this conflict more by the passive nature of the inhabitants than by their active resistance to the invaders. Following the Revolution, a significant number of Americans who had remained loyal to Britain throughout the war flocked to Canada. They settled in every one of the remaining British colonies and by their concentrations led to the creation of two new colonies, Ontario (Upper Canada) and New Brunswick. They were eventually followed by other settlers from the United States who were attracted to Canada, and especially Upper Canada, by the prospect of free land rather than loyalty to the Crown. By 1812 the English-speaking protestant population of British North America had reached sufficient numbers to have altered the general character of these colonies.

Background to War

On 18 June 1812 President James Madison officially declared war on Great Britain. This was the final act in the prelude to war which had begun a decade earlier when Britain had resumed its war with France. The causes of the war centred on three major issues --- the British naval blockade of Napoleonic Europe which hurt American commerce, the seizure of British deserters from American ships on the high seas by the Royal Navy, and the American belief that the British were encouraging the Indians in the western United States to resist American settlement in that area. Underlying these issues was an American desire to control all of North America --- an aspect which later became known as Manifest Destiny.

The United States had many advantages over the modest British colonies to the north which were undoubtedly well-known to the "war hawks" of the American Congress and which were certainly influential in encouraging a war with Great Britain. First and foremost, the United States had a large reserve of manpower on which to build an army as well as possessing the financial and industrial means of waging war far in excess of British North America. Furthermore, with Britain heavily involved in a European war and unable to properly defend its colonies, it was in a much weaker position than that of the United States. In fact, at the outbreak of war with the United States, Britain had only about 4500 regular troops stationed in Canada, and only 1500 of these were located west of Montreal. The Americans also believed that the Canadians were now ready to throw off the yoke of British dominance and join them in their free republic. This particular conviction resulted from the knowledge that anti-British feelings had been fostered among the French-Canadians by the autocratic administration of former Governor General Sir James Craig and that many Americans with republican sentiments had settled in Upper Canada to take advantage of the free land grants.

Although the advantages to the Americans were quite obvious, there were some British advantages which they largely ignored or under-emphasized. For one, the British could be guaranteed of the loyalty of the Indians both in Canada and the western United States, and secondly by having naval supremacy on the Great Lakes could hinder an American offensive against Canada. These two factors were certainly instrumental in repelling the American invasions during the opening stages of the war. As well, the British militia system had undergone radical reorganization shortly before the war in anticipation of a possible conflict with the United States. As a result, the Canadian militia was better prepared for a war than their American counterparts.

The American Strategy

The Americans planned a three-pronged attack on Canada. One force would attack across the Detroit River while another moved across the Niagara River, eventually joining up to push the British back along the north shore of Lake Ontario. As this was happening, a third force would follow the traditional invasion route to Canada along the Lake Champlain/Richelieu River watercourse and attack Montreal. With Montreal's fall, the British troops in the west would be cut off from supplies and reinforcements and would eventually surrender. Ontario residents with republican sentiments were expected to join and assist the American armies as they pushed the British back towards Montreal. With only a few minor changes, this general strategy was to dominate American military thought during the entire course of the war.

The plan itself had many inherent weaknesses. By attacking three widely separated objectives, the Americans were forced to divide their forces into three smaller units, each much weaker than a single combined army. Also, by conducting an offensive along the north shore of Lake Ontario they were committed to stretching their supply lines over a long distance in an area generally inaccessible by road and almost completely dependent on water transport. And, had the British troops been pushed back towards Kingston from both east and west, they would eventually have been concentrated along a small front at a time when the American supply lines would have been stretched to their limit. The final weakness in the plan centered around the support to be given the American troops by the inhabitants with republican sentiments, an aspect which ultimately proved to be non-existent.

These weaknesses in the American plan manifested themselves early in the conflict and, in part, contributed to the failure of the early American offensives. These were further supplemented by the incompetence of the American generals during the war's opening days and by the American militia's reluctance to commit themselves to an all-out war. Had the Americans concentrated their attack along the Lake Champlain / Richelieu River invasion route only, they might have been successful in conquering Canada within the first few months of the conflict.

The Opening Scenes

At the war's commencement, the American government gave the command of their forces to General Henry Dearborn (1751-1829), a veteran of the Revolutionary War. The British forces at the time were tentatively commanded by Sir George Prevost (1767-1816), then the Governor General of Canada.

Brigadier General William Hull (1753-1825) was placed in charge of the western division of the American army and, shortly after, took up his command at Fort Detroit.

On 11 July 1812 with 2500 men he crossed the Detroit River into Canada. The British troops in the area, vastly outnumbered by the invading forces, tactfully retreated to Amherstburg. With the exception of a few minor skirmishes north of Amherstburg (2, 3 -- the numbers which will appear in parentheses in the text can be used to identify the location of the battles on the maps included in this introduction, as well as in the chronological summary of the war which appears later in the commentary) and some intermittent raids into Canada along the Thames River, Hull was content to sit with his army on the banks of the Detroit River.

The commander of the British forces in Upper Canada, Major General Sir Isaac Brock (1769-1812), realized at an early date that his regular forces were significantly outnumbered by the Americans and, because of the republican sympathizers in Upper Canada, he was somewhat distrusting of the local militia. Concluding that the only way the British would be able to successfully resist the American invasion was by enlisting the full support of the Indians, he decided that he had to secure several minor victories over the Americans in order to cement an alliance with the Indians. This aspect could be accomplished by launching the offensive in several key areas, each aimed at securing a limited objective. He sent orders to the British Governor General, Joseph's Island in Lake Huron instructing him to attack the American post at Michilimackinac at his discretion. On 17 July 1812, a force of British regulars and local militia and Indians appeared outside of the American fort. Michilimackinac quickly surrendered to the larger force (1) and remained in British hands for the duration of the war. With its fall, the Indians of the Northwest were convinced of British superiority, and allied themselves with them against the Americans. On 15 August, a party of Indians attacked Fort Dearborn (Chicago) (7) and slaughtered the garrison and inhabitants as they were evacuating the fort.

On learning of the fall of Michilimackinac, Hull withdrew his troops across the Detroit River on 7-11 August. On 13 August Brock arrived in Amherstburg with 300 reserve troops and began to make plans for a general offensive against Detroit. Captured American documents provided information on Hull's inadequacies and the American troops' fear of the Indians, both of which were further confirmed at several skirmishes on the American side of the Detroit River (5, 6). On 15 August Brock began his attack with 300 regulars, 400 militia and 600 Indians under the Shawnee chief Tecumseh (1768?-1813). Playing on the American fear of the Indians, Brock warned the Detroit garrison that he might not be able to control the Indians under his command if the siege proved to be lengthy. Fearful of the consequences of a long siege, Hull surrendered Detroit and his army on 16 August 1812 (8). Brock then turned command of the British forces at Detroit over to Lieut.-Colonel Henry Procter (1764-1822) and returned to Niagara to prepare for the American offensive expected there.

American troops had been gathering on the eastern side of the Niagara River under the command of Major General Stephen Van Renssalaer (1764-1839) since shortly after the declaration of war. Fortunately for Canada, Van Renssalaer was slow in preparing for his offensive, giving the British time to plan some defensive measures. Brock had some 1500-1700 men in the Niagara Peninsula to resist the American forces. Unable to predict at what point the American offensive would take place, although assuming it to be at Fort George, he deployed his men along the length of the Niagara River. Meanwhile, the Americans had decided to land at the town of Queenston and on 12 October made an unsuccessful attempt to cross the river at this spot. Brock considered this a ruse to take attention away from the expected crossing at Fort George, and did nothing to reinforce his garrison at Queenston. Then, on 13 October, the Americans crossed the river again and this time were able to establish a beachhead at Queenston (12). Opposing them was a small British force of 350 men, mostly regulars. The Americans had a force of 6300 men, 3700 of whom were regulars, most of which waited on the American side of the Niagara until the bridgehead was secure. The small British force was able to hold the Americans somewhat in check during their initial landing and Brock, awakened at Fort George by the noise of the battle, ordered relief troops to Queenston before leaving for the battle site. Reorganizing the remnants of the British forces, Brock led them in an attack against the heights in order to recover the British guns captured earlier by the Americans. In the course of the attack, Brock was shot and killed. His men continued to hold the Americans in check until the relief force under Major General Sir Roger Hale Sheaffe (1763-1851) was able to arrive and attack the invaders from the woods on the top of the escarpment. American casualties were heavy, due partly to the difficulty of shipping supplies across the river and partly to the reluctance of the New York State Militia to cross to Canada. The members of the militia, on hearing the fury of the battle on the Canadian side of the river, had refused to embark, arguing that they had only been engaged to fight within the State of New York. With their ammunition running low and their reinforcements non-existent, the American force of nearly 1000 men on the Canadian shore could do little else but surrender. Following this failure, Van Renssalaer resigned as the American commander and was replaced by Brigadier General Alexander Smyth (1765-1830). A month later, Smyth recrossed the Niagara River, this time at Fort Erie, and was met by a British force from Fort George (16) and repelled. Retreating to the American side of the river, he tried another offensive on the 1st of December but, due to the refusal of the Pennsylvania Militia to cross into Canada, was forced to abandon the attempt. He resigned his command shortly after.

Several raids in the St. Lawrence River area (9, 10, 13, 14) were conducted by the British and Americans both before and after the Niagara offensive although none proved to be decisive actions. In November, General Dearborn moved on Montreal with a force of 5000 men along the Lake Champlain route but only penetrated into Canada as far as Lacolle (15) before turning back. Again, the American offensive was impeded by the reluctance of the state militia to cross into Canada.

At the close of 1812, the Americans had made no significant gains in Canada, and the British had managed to acquire and retain control of Detroit and the upper Great Lakes.

The War Takes Shape

Following their disastrous beginning in 1812, the war in 1813 proved to be a little kinder to the Americans. Although their overall position did not improve significantly during this year, the Americans were able to enjoy several successes which served to boost the morale of their troops.

The new year opened on the Detroit front. Following the surrender of General Hull, General William Henry Harrison (1773-1841), the victor of Tippecanoe in 1811 and a future President of the United States, was appointed commander of the forces in the western division. The British had largely confined themselves to the area around Detroit in the months following its surrender and made few attempts to move on the other American posts to the south. The only major offensive took place in August 1812 when a small British force had moved against Fort Wayne. However, upon learning that the American garrison had been reinforced by a large contingent of troops, they had withdrawn to Detroit without engaging the enemy.

Early in January 1813 Harrison moved an advance guard to the Maumee (Miami) River, which at that time was the southern limit of effective British control in the area. Beginning on 18 January, this force was able to push the British line back to Brownstown. Procter promptly reacted to this advance action by attacking the Americans at Frenchtown on 22 January (17) with a force of 950 men and Indians, inflicting a serious defeat on the Americans and capturing the opposing army together with its commander, Brigadier General James Winchester (1752-1826). For his success, Procter was promoted to Major General. For several months after the engagement all military activities in the Detroit region subsided.

Meanwhile, the Americans had formulated a new invasion plan in which they proposed to attack Kingston as soon as they were able to transport their troops across the frozen ice of Lake Ontario. However, Dearborn's procrastination delayed its implementation until the changing weather forced its abandonment. During this period, minor raids were staged on Brockville (18) and Ogdensburg (19), undoubtedly to show the strength and conviction of both armies.

The first American act of invasion east of Detroit occurred on 27 April 1813 when a naval force of 15 ships and 1700 men under the command of Captain (later Commodore) Isaac Chauncey (1772-1840) and Major General Dearborn arrived at York from Sackets Harbor (20). After a minor resistance to the superior invading force, Major General Sheaffe abandoned York and retreated to Kingston. The Americans burned the provincial parliament buildings before departing and, although by capturing York they had succeeded in cutting the communication lines between Kingston and western Ontario, did nothing to exploit their success and treated the engagement merely as a raid. Upon arriving in Kingston, Sheaffe was replaced as commander of the British forces in Upper Canada by Major General Francis, Baron de Rottenburg (1757-1832), who remained in command for most of the balance of 1813.

At the beginning of May, Procter resumed his offensive against the Americans. With 900 men and 1200 Indians under Tecumseh, he attacked Fort Meigs (21), but was unable to take it, although he did defeat an American army sent to relieve the fort. Following this engagement, Procter returned to Fort Malden (near Amherstburg) where he spent the summer gathering together a large Indian force to assist him in future offensives. At about this time, Commodore James Lucus Yeo (1782-1818) of the Royal Navy arrived in Upper Canada to take command of British naval affairs on Lake Ontario.

Following the raid on York, Dearborn had proceeded to Fort Niagara where an American army of 6000 men was poised for an attack on the Niagara Peninsula. Opposing them was a force of 1500 men under the command of Major General John Vincent (1765-1848). The American invasion preparations were organized by Lieutenant-Colonel (later Brigadier General) Winfield Scott (1786-1866), Dearborn's adjutant. He proposed to land men and guns west of Newark, encircle Newark and Fort George and, at the same time, cut off a British retreat to Queenston by sending a small force of dragoons across the Niagara River about 5 miles above the British defenses. The initial landing took place as planned and a bridgehead established under the cover of American naval guns. Two-thirds of the British troops attempting to contain the invasion were casualties. Once the Americans had secured the bridgehead, the British forces abandoned Fort George and, joined by the garrisons from Fort Erie and Chippawa, retreated to the southwest. Fortunately, they were not harassed by the American dragoons who had been kept from crossing the river by a British artillery battery until the retreat was completed. The British continued to Burlington Heights, near Ancaster, and waited for the American advance. The victorious American forces entered Fort George on 27 May (22).

The Americans did not resume their offensive until 2 June, eventually arriving and camping at Stoney Creek on 5 June with 2000 men. During the night, the British attacked with 1600 men from Burlington Heights and inflicted a decisive defeat on the invaders (25). The Americans regrouped with some reinforcements from Fort George and were preparing to counter-attack when Yeo appeared off the coast with the British fleet, fresh from their blockade of Sackets Harbor (23). Influenced by these new developments, the Americans retreated to Fort George. Now restricted to a small area around the fort and their movements hindered by British outposts near the front, the Americans found themselves in an awkward position. Brigadier General John Parker Boyd (1764-1830), who had taken over command due to Dearborn's illness, ordered Colonel Charles A. Boerstler to attack the outpost at Beaver Dam to help relieve some of this pressure. Boerstler, his troops whipped to a state of terror by repeated Indian attacks on the way to Beaver Dam, surrendered to Lieut. James FitzGibbon (1780-1863), the British commander, on 24 June (27) without firing a single shot. With this defeat, the Americans found themselves completely and permanently confined to the small area around Fort George.

During July, a British force crossed the Niagara River and harassed Fort Schlosser (28) and Black Rock. An American naval attack on Burlington Heights shortly after was discouraged before it began when Yeo appeared on the scene. Chauncey retreated, but not before staging another raid on undefended York (29). With these setbacks, Dearborn resigned and was replaced by Major General James Wilkinson (1757-1825).

The situation at Detroit during this time had remained fairly quiet. Procter had managed to raise a considerable force of Indians, although he had been unable to convince Governor General Prevost to send him the British reinforcements he required for his campaign, an aspect which would eventually help in his defeat. In August, he moved against Fort Stephenson but was repelled (30). Concerned that his last two defeats would influence the Indians to abandon the British side in the war, he encouraged Captain Robert Barclay (1785 - 1837), the British naval commander on Lake Erie, to engage the American fleet as a British show of strength. Barclay met the Americans under Captain Oliver Hazard Perry (1785-1819) at Put-in Bay on 10 September (31) and, by an odd set of circumstances, was defeated.

The defeat of the British fleet was a major blow to Procter's campaign. With only 877 men, many of whom were sick, and with the loyalty of the Indians now in question, he decided that it would be best to abandon Fort Detroit and retreat along the Thames River to Burlington Heights. A rear guard detachment of his retreating forces was defeated at Chatham on 4 October (35) and the main force of Harrison's army of 3500 men overtook him near Moraviantown the following day. Against these overwhelming odds, Procter was defeated at what is known as the Battle of the Thames (36). This was the first complete land victory for the American army since the start of the war. However, despite the decisiveness of his victory and the open road to Burlington Heights, Harrison did not pursue his foe, choosing instead to return to Detroit and allowing Procter and the remnants of his army to retreat unhampered. The Battle of the Thames marked the defeat of the British on the Detroit front and, with Tecumseh's death during the battle, the decline of the Indians as a major third force on the British lines. With Detroit in American hands, the British abandoned this front and began to concentrate their efforts on the Niagara and St. Lawrence River/Lake Champlain sectors.

The American Push on Canada

While the American offensive on the Detroit front was taking place, the preparations for a major offensive against Montreal were being concluded. The plan was to attack Montreal from two directions. The first force was to move west from Lake Champlain to St. Regis on the St. Lawrence at the same time as a second force came down the St. Lawrence from Sackets Harbor. The two armies would meet at St. Regis for a combined attack on Montreal. The Lake Champlain contingent was placed under the command of Brigadier General Wade Hampton (1751?-1835) and the St. Lawrence contingent under the command of Major General James Wilkinson. However, the animosity which existed between the two men led to a lack of co-ordination of the two forces and ultimately helped in the failure of the invasion. Hampton, with 4000 men, began his march to the St. Lawrence as scheduled but because of the lack of fodder along the initial route altered his course and proceeded down the Chateauguay River instead. Near the present site of Allen's Corners, he encountered an advance force of 800 Voltigeurs and 170 Indians under the command of Lieut.-Colonel Charles de Salaberry. After a short battle on 26 October (39), Hampton withdrew his troops and retreated to the United States, concluding from a dispatch that there was no serious intention of moving on Montreal.

As Hampton retreated, Wilkinson was advancing down the St. Lawrence with 8000 men. He was hampered along this route by a small British force of 800 men and Indians which had been able to land in his rear early in his march. In order to provide a general cover for the bulk of his army while it navigated the treacherous Long Sault Rapids, he decided to confront the British force at the head of the rapids at the farm of John Chrysler on 11 November (41). The Americans were defeated, primarily because they regarded the battle as a rear guard action only and therefore did not commit sufficient troops to the engagement. However it did accomplish its primary objective, providing the necessary delaying action to allow Wilkinson to pass through the rapids and continue down the St. Lawrence. At Cornwall, Wilkinson received news of Hampton's defeat and retreat in Lower Canada and, with that news, turned his army south and returned to the United States.

With the collapse of the American offensive against Montreal, the British turned their attention to the Niagara Peninsula. The Americans were still in control of Fort George although the initial invading force of regulars had been sent to participate in the Montreal offensive and had been replaced by members of the New York militia. Fearing an attack from the British, the American militia withdrew from the fort and burned Newrak early in December. On 18-19 December, the British under the command of Lieut.-Colonel Phineas Riall (1775-1850), Vincent's success-of the American side of the Niagara River. As well, the British had been able to repel all major American offensives on Canada.

The War Continues

The opening months of 1814 were relatively quiet on all fronts. With the exception of a few minor raids at Long Woods (46), Otter Creek (49), Port Dover (50), Sandy Creek (51) and Odelltown (52), the only major conflicts were the American attack on Lacolle in March (47) and the British naval and land attack on Oswego at the beginning of May (48). Both major engagements ended in British victories.

or, launched a two-pronged attack against the American bases across the Niagara River. The first force of 550 regulars attacked and captured Fort Niagara (42) while a second force of 500 men and 500 Indians under Riall simultaneously attacked and burned Lewiston (43) and then proceeded south along the river burning Manchester and Fort Schlosser. Several days later, Riall and a force of 1500 men routed an American militia force of 2000 at Buffalo (45), and burned both the town and the American naval yard at Black Rock (44).

The war in 1813 closed with the Americans in control of the Amherstburg area of Canada and the British in effective control

Command of the American forces was now in the hands of Major General Jacob Jennings Brown (1775-1828). The American government had decided by this time that the only way to turn the tide of the war in their favour was to attack Kingston with a major force while at the same time launching a minor diversionary offensive on Niagara. Misinterpreting his instructions, as a choice between the two fronts, Brown chose the weaker of the two and concentrated his efforts on an offensive on Niagara. The British attack on Oswego further convinced him that it would be prudent to avoid a direct attack on the stronger base at Kingston.

Brown was much more fortunate than those of his predecessors who had been forced to use inexperienced and undisciplined troops. The large number of American land failures had convinced the military that only well-trained and well-disciplined soldiers would be able to overwhelm the British. By emphasizing proper training, the Americans were able to build a formidable army and, because of this, 1814 would see some of the stiffest fighting of the war.

Brown moved his army to Buffalo from Sackets Harbor to join the forces under the command of Winfield Scott. By June, the Americans were ready to move. The plan was to push the British out of the Niagara Peninsula, take the head of the lake, and then march east to York and on to Kingston. The Americans crossed the river with 3500 men on 3 July, attacking and taking Fort Erie (53). Marching north, they encountered a British force of 2100 men and Indians under Riall at Chippawa on 5 July (54). Defeated, the British retreated towards Fort George with the Americans in pursuit.

The Americans delayed their attack on Fort George to wait for Chauncey's fleet to arrive and give them naval fire cover. However, Chauncey was ill at Sackets Harbor and refused to turn over his fleet to his second in command. The American ships never arrived at Niagara. Finally, the Americans withdrew to Chippawa to review the situation.

Meanwhile, Lieut.-General Sir Gordon Drummond, who had taken over command of the British forces in Upper Canada at the end of 1813, arrived at Fort George with reinforcements. Taking command of the Niagara campaign he proceeded south along the Niagara River with a force of 3100 men. Another smaller force of 500 British regulars from Fort Niagara advanced south along the other side of the river to threaten the American rear and supply depot at Fort Schlosser. The American force, now numbering 4200 men, marched north from Chippawa and the two armies met at a crossroads known as Lundy's Lane on 25 July (57). The Americans initially gained the field, but were eventually pushed back by the British. Worn down by the counter-offensive, the Americans retreated to Fort Erie and began to strengthen its fortifications so that it could be retained as a bridgehead. Drummond then surrounded the fort hoping to secure its fall, but after some weeks abandoned the siege (58) when it became obvious that it was ineffective.

The American forces at Fort Erie were later reinforced by troops from Sackets

Harbor under the command of General George Izard, who then assumed command of the American forces at Niagara. Although their forces now numbered 6000 men, the Americans restricted themselves to infrequent raids into the Niagara Peninsula at such places as Cook's Mills (67). On 5 November, the American forces abandoned Fort Erie and returned to Buffalo. This assault on Niagara was the only major American offensive against Canada in 1814.

Elsewhere on the continent, the war was progressing quite favourably for the British. In the Northwest, a British force from Michilimackinac succeeded in capturing Prairie du Chien (56) on the Mississippi River, deep in American territory, during mid-July. After this, an American force tried to capture Michilimackinac on 4 August but was repulsed (59). The defeated American forces on Lake Huron then proceeded to Nottawasaga Bay where they were able to sink the only major British vessel on the lake (60), following which the American naval commander dispatched two ships to the north shore of Lake Huron to harass the supply lines to Michilimackinac. By sheer luck and daring, the British naval commander, Lieut. Miller Worsley, managed to capture both of these ships (64) and secured Lake Huron as a British lake for the duration of the war.

In the Maritimes, the war had generally passed without much incident. Other than commissioning 37 vessels as privateers to raid American shipping (the privateers captured a total of 207 American vessels throughout the war), the British remained passive until the closing months of 1814. On 11 July, a British force attacked Eastport (55), but this was primarily an action against the American smugglers who operated from this port. At the beginning of September, Lieut.-General Sir John Sherbrooke moved against the United States with the aim of re-establishing the ancient boundaries of French Acadia which had extended as far south as the Penobscot River in Maine. The British forces attacked Castine on 1 September (62) and two days later won a victory at Hampton (63) just south of Bangor. The entire Maritime offensive was completed within two weeks and the territory north of the Penobscot passed into British hands.

Meanwhile, the war in the Spanish Peninsula against Napoleon had been successfully concluded by the British, resulting in the release of veteran forces for the protection of the Empire. During July and August, some 12,000 of these soldiers were landed at Quebec to reinforce the British garrisons in the Canadas. In September, Sir George Prevost with 11,000 of these seasoned veterans marched on Plattsburg in New York. However, before launching a major offensive on the town, he waited to see the outcome of the naval engagement on Lake Champlain near Plattsburg (66). Following the British defeat on the lake and a minor skirmish with the American forces at Plattsburg (65), Prevost returned to Montreal with his army. With this retreat, all major military engagements in Canada ended.

British Offensives on the United States

During the second half of 1814, the British had more troops at their disposal to resolve the war in North America. Although their actions in the United States had little bearing on the outcome of the war in Canada, their activities did constitute the last major engagements of the conflict.

The first British assault on the United States took place near Washington. On 24 August, the British routed an American force at Bladensburg, marched into Washington and on retiring the following day set fire to the city. Several weeks later, they attacked Baltimore, but were forced to retreat after three days. Following this, the British remained largely inactive until December. Landing outside of New Orleans in that month, they attacked the city's defenses and were defeated by the Americans under General Andrew Jackson. Ironically, the battle at New Orleans was fought after the treaty ending the war had been signed.

The Treaty of Ghent

The Treaty of Ghent was concluded on 24 December 1814, and formally ended the conflict. The treaty reinstated the borders which had existed at the beginning of the war but, surprisingly, did not address any of the major causes which had led to the declaration of war. The treaty was certainly the greatest American victory of the war because, at the time it was signed, the Americans held only the area around Amherstburg in Upper Canada while the British controlled northern Maine, the upper Mississippi River country, and Fort Niagara. What the Americans had been unable to accomplish on the battlefield, they were able to gain at the bargaining table.

Outcome of the War

The War of 1812 ended in a general stalemate and, through the terms of the peace treaty, the retention of the status quo in North America. The British successes during 1814 could have enabled them to demand and receive territorial concessions from the Americans had they pressed for them. However, the British weariness of war in general certainly must have been influential in their decision to conclude the conflict in North America as quickly and painlessly as possible.

The war did offer several military lessons to both sides. It identified the regular soldier as superior to the untrained militiaman in such a conflict. The Americans were quick to learn this lesson and, once they had ensured that their armies were well trained and disciplined, they became a formidable adversary. The importance of naval supremacy on the Great Lakes also became evident as a result of the war. The British supremacy during the opening days of the war certainly prevented the Americans from achieving a quick conquest, and the American failure to command Lake Ontario later in the war undoubtedly hindered their offensives.

Popular opinion in Canada has attributed the failure of the American invasions to the patriotic involvement of the Canadian militia. Although the militia did play an important supportive role in the conflict, its participation was almost always secondary to that of the British regulars. The backbone of the British resistance to the Americans was the regular soldier and the British officers who led the armies. However, although credit for the British success must be given to the regular soldier, full credit for the victory cannot rest with them alone. The British success was actually the result of the cooperation between the three major components of its forces --- the regulars, the militia, and the Indians. Each of these functioned well within their defined areas of responsibilities and, had any one of them been left out of the composition of the defense, the outcome of the war may well have been different. The harmony of the British forces, the initial British superiority on the Great Lakes, the incompetence of the American commanders and the reluctance of the American militia during the opening days of the war, all combined to provide the British with a strong advantage over the invaders.

The War of 1812 was a conflict which should not have taken place. It solved nothing and it provided no gains to either side. Essentially, it was a war in which both sides emerged as losers, and neither as victors. The British sustained 8600 official casualties, the Americans 11,300 (killed, wounded, missing and captured), although the actual figures may well be somewhat higher. Even with the peace treaty, this war has not ended

Today, it is fought again and again on the pages of the history books of two nations. Canadians celebrate the war as a victory against American aggression, pointing with pride to the great successes of the numerically inferior British land forces over the American armies, but avoiding lengthy discussion of the disastrous naval battles. The Americans are proud of their many naval victories over the greatest naval power of the day but are quite silent about their numerous defeats on land. In many respects, it was a war of contradictions, with enough successes by both sides in opposite theatres to allow each to claim some element of victory.

Despite the waste in property and lives, the War of 1812 does stand out as a milestone in Canadian-American relations. It marks the first and last time that differences between these two nations have been taken to the battlefield for resolution. Since 1815, these two nations have coexisted in peace, a situation which appears will continue into the future.

Chronological History of the War

The following chronology has been compiled to provide a quick overview of the war and to act as an index to the location of the battlesites on the maps included in this introduction. The numbers indicated below have been used on the accompanying maps and have been repeated in the historical introduction. Only major battles are shown here.

Locating Records on a War of 1812 Veteran

The war of 1812 was primarily fought in Upper Canada (Ontario), with the activities in the western portion of Lower Canada (Quebec) identifying this province as a secondary theatre. For the most part, the Maritimes remained distant from the war, the activities there primarily restricted to privateering and the assault on Maine during the closing months of 1814.

As a country which remained dependant on the British military for its defense until the latter half of the 19th century, Canada has not developed a systematic record collection devoted to housing all of its military records. Consequently, documents relating to its early military conflicts are generally scattered throughout a variety of official government collections and within the papers of private individuals and miscellaneous colonial departments. This diversity can hamper the collection of material on a veteran of the War of 1812, and records which have not been identified as potential sources for this conflict can easily go unchecked.

The most centralized and complete collections which deal with this war can be found at the Public Archives of Canada, 395 Wellington Street, Ottawa, Ontario K1A 0N3. Although other material exists in provincial and regional archives which can supplement the collections here, these in the Public Archives undoubtedly represent the most ambitious attempt to centralize the records of this war, and will generally provide most researchers with sufficient details on their subjects' military service at the time.

The most valuable of the collections at the Public Archives of Canada include:

RG 8, BRITISH MILITARY AND NAVAL RECORDS:

This series houses a list of veterans of the War of 1812 to whom medals were granted, compiled by Benjamin Sulte in 1896, as well as the muster rolls of the units which served during the conflict, and an unofficial list of militia officers in Upper and Lower Canada at the time compiled by F. X. Lambert. The Subject files in the Correspondence of the Military Secretary of the Commander of the Forces contains material on those subjects relative to the war, including aliens, appointments and memorials, claims for losses, courts martial, half pay, land, militia, pensioners, and files on miscellaneous regiments arranged by name or number of the regiment. Also included within this vast collection are diverse materials relating to the naval establishment at Kingston and the Admiralty Lake Service Records, both containing some information on the naval personnel during the war. This entire collection has been indexed and microfilmed. A general inventory is available entitled: Preliminary Inventory: Record Group 8: British Military and Naval Records (Ottawa: PAC 1954)

RG 9: DEPARTMENT OF MILITIA AND DEFENSE:

Within this collection are the records accumulated by the Adjutants General of Militia in Upper and Lower Canada, including the muster rolls and paylists of units serving in this war. Other supportive documentation is also found here, such as registers of officers, officers' commissions, material relating to courts martial, petitions for land and pensions (often made long after the war), miscellaneous pension records, and another medal register of participants. A general inventory of this collection can be found in Preliminary Inventory: Record Group 9: Department of Militia and Defense (Ottawa PAC 1957). As a general rule, most of this collection does not appear on microfilm.

RG 19, FINANCE: The War of 1812 Losses Claims are housed in this series, and consist of requests for compensation for losses suffered as a result of the American invasions. A nominal index exists for these records.

MISCELLANEOUS COLLECTIONS: A number of miscellaneous muster rolls can be found in several other PAC collections, notably MG 12, Adm. 28 (for the HMS Shannon), MG 13, WO 10, (two artillery companies), and MG 13, WO 12 (several other units). MGS13, WO 25, Registers, Various contains "Casualty Returns 1812-15" for several militia battalions, and RG 5, Series A1: Upper Canada Sundries includes a section on "Traitors and Treason, War of 1812." Additional records also appear in other collections at the PAC.

Other collections relating to this war can also be found in other sections of the Public Archives, as well as in other archives in Canada. The Archives nationales in Quebec has several collections relating exclusively to the war and to lands granted to the veterans, for example, and the Ontario Archives has a High Treason Register which was compiled in the 1920s from material at the Ontario Archives and the Public Archives of Canada. Information on activities in the Maritimes can be found at the Public Archives of Nova Scotia in RG 22: Nova Scotia Military Papers and in RG 40: Court of Vice-Admiralty (records relating to captured American ships) and in the New Brunswick Provincial Archives in RG 2, Record Sections 7 and 8. Throughout these archives, and in many others across Canada, various muster rolls, paylists and other documentation can also be found in the collected papers of private individuals who participated in some capacity during the war. These private collections can be difficult to identify as relating to the war and will often be discovered by accident. Some of these collections have been identified in The Union List of Manuscripts in Canadian Repositories (Ottawa: Public Archives of Canada 1975, 2 volumes; supplement 1976, 1 volume), and others can be found by examining the inventories of the respective institutions.

Virtually all of the collections identified above relate to the militia forces in the war. If an ancestor was a member of the Imperial forces and not a militiaman, it is necessary to conduct research on his activities in the collections at the Public Record Office, Ruskin Avenue, Kew, Surrey, England, where the records of Imperial soldiers are concentrated, or in such published works as L. Homfrey Irving: Officers of the British Forces in Canada During the War of 1812 (Welland: Welland Tribune Printers 1908).

Further information on the military records of Canada, and on the procedures for locating material on a military ancestor, can be found in such works as:

Because there is such a profusion of published works on the War of 1812, rather than try to provide a general bibliography of material here, which would be inadequate at best, researchers are advised to consult standard bibliographical publications on Canada.

Canadian Veterans of the War of 1812

In 1875, the Canadian Parliament voted to distribute the sum of $50,000 in $20.00 increments to all Canadian militia veterans of the War of 1812 who were still alive and residing in Canada. Surviving veterans were invited to contact the Department of Militia and Defense, providing details on their service for verification of their eligibility to participate in the gratuity. Over a three year period, the names and personal information of all applicants were published in the Dominion Sessional Papers (DSP). The first list, containing 554 names, was published in DSP Vol. 8, 1875, (No. 7), SP 25, pp. 1-15, and consisted primarily of the names of the applicants with some scant background information. The second list was published in DSP, Vol. 9, 1876, (No. 6), SP 7, pp. 1-95 under the general heading "Statement Showing the Name and Residence of Militiamen of 1812-15 who Have Applied to Participate in the Gratuity Granted By Parliament in 1875". The most comprehensive of the lists, this contains considerable background information on the 3024 applicants included, and is arranged in general alphabetical order by surname. The third and final published list appeared in DSP, Vol. 10, 1877, (No. 8), SP 76, pp. 1-109 but is essentially nothing more than a financial re-capitulation of the second list, arranged by the geographical residence of the veteran and containing only the veteran's name and the amount paid to him. The first two of these lists have been reproduced on the following pages. The third has not, as it contained nothing which did not already appear in the first two lists.

In his preface to the 1876 list, C. Eugene Panet, then Deputy Minister of Militia and Defense and the official charged with the implementation of the gratuity, outlined the procedures used in identifying the veterans and the criterion used in determining their eligibility. He indicated that the veterans were deemed eligible on presentation of the following vouchers:

- "1. A satisfactory comparison of their own declaration with the official documents on record in this department;

2. The appearance of their name on the list of those who were awarded land grants for their services during the war of 1812-15;
3. A solemn declaration of identity from the applicant;
4. A solemn declaration of services and personal identity from another veteran or other person who had personal knowledge of his services in 1812-15."

To assist those applicants who were not able to furnish irrefutable proof of service by themselves, the department sent officers to personally visit them and examine their declarations. In that way, some of the applicants were able to verify their claims.

Of the total number in the 1876 list, Panet indicated that 2554 had successfully proven their services during the war. A total of 127 cases were disallowed because the applicant could not prove his service, and a further 343 were disallowed for a variety of other reasons, such as the fact that they had served in the Imperial forces, had left Canada and were living in the United States, or had died while their application was being processed. Virtually all of the applicants were residents of either Quebec or Ontario, and most were "in indigent circumstances, many having no one to depend upon for support, and living on public charity."

Panet concluded his introduction with a general synopsis of the number of militiamen who took up arms in Canada during the war. Although he emphasized the lack of sufficient data for Upper Canada, he did indicate that it appeared as if a total of 5455 officers and men actively participated in the conflict. In Lower Canada, he found that documentation indicated an active militia force of 6617 men with a further 16,244 men being called up on occasion for service ranging from a few days to a few months, and another 674 men involved in various other military activities at times. This gives a total of about 12,000 militiamen on active service in both Upper and Lower Canada with an additional force of close to 17,000 men. He also estimated that the Imperial forces who served in Canada amounted to some 13,000 men. Altogether, about 42,000 men served under the British flag during this conflict.

The following lists represent the only attempt to publish the names of the Canadian veterans of the War of 1812, although other lists of participants do exist in manuscript form. While the following does not pretend to represent a comprehensive accounting of the British men under arms during the conflict, it is hoped that by its reprinting it will assist researchers in identifying some military ancestors who participated in the war and will lead them to other sources which will serve to verify their participation.
